Education is a public good. We should treat it as such. And we should fund it as such.

Two-thirds of Scottish university applicants would put off going to university if tuition fees were introduced

2 July 2020

Almost two-thirds of university applicants living in Scotland (63%) said they would defer going to university in the autumn if tuition fees were introduced in Scotland, warns polling released today.

Around a quarter (26%) of those who provided further detail said simply that they would not be able to afford to go to university at all if fees were brought in.

UCU said the survey* - conducted for the union by research company Progressive - highlighted how tuition fees would lead to a further reduction in student numbers and income for universities with students from Scotland staying away at a time when the number of international students also looks set to plummet.

Research carried out for UCU found that around 9,500 fewer international students were expected to study in Scotland this autumn, compared to previous years.

Maintaining at least the current level of free tuition is non-negotiable for Scotland's students.
